

Father's Day

by Katie Clark

Miguel hurried to his room after finishing his chores. Tomorrow was Father's Day, but he still hadn't completed Dad's gift. He'd used cardboard boxes and heavy-duty tape to make a set of shelves. Next, he'd used paint from the utility closet to color it brown. Now the paint was dry and the shelves were in the process of being filled with Dad's tools to be used for Father's Day.

He peeked out from behind the shelves from his room. He didn't want Dad getting suspicious.

Miguel rounded up the tools from the garage and flipped them over onto the shelves. The shelves were overflowing from a top to bottom.

With this shelf, Miguel could store various projects. He was proud of his gift.

It took half an hour, but soon Miguel had arranged the hammers, wrenches, screwdrivers, and cans of nails onto his cardboard shelves. The shelves were wobbly but they stayed upright.

When he was done, Miguel tiptoed back into the house. He would tell Dad about his gift first thing in the morning.

He had the opportunity to pull out the tools quickly. He didn't want to be caught.

He hurried inside to his dad's workbench and found the tools he needed.

He used these tools for fixing the shelves. He was proud to see it.

Dad returned the hug with a smile. “Thanks, Miguel. Why don’t you show me?”

Miguel led him to the garage. He opened the door and flipped the light switch, then he gestured to the shelves with a grin.

But the wobbly boxes were destroyed on the floor.

Miguel’s excitement faded.

He looked quickly at the boxes stretched from ear to ear.

Miguel frowned.

Miguel’s disappointment took Dad’s hand. “I’ll look at those shelves tonight. The boxes laid on the shelves,” he said.

“I’ll look at them,” Dad said, but Dad’s smile

wasn’t as wide. “That is, if you’ll help me look at those shelves. He
