Ferdinand Magellan

by Katie Clark

Ferdinand Magellan was an explorer from Portugal. He lived over five hundred years ago. He is credited with being the first European to sail completely around the globe—an amazing accomplishment!

Born around 1480, Magellan was from a noble family. This made it possible for him to travel. In his twenties, he entered the service of his home country, Portugal.

During this time, he learned to navigate and to sail.

The islands were called the Spice Islands. This was because the rulers in Europe wanted to get to these places.

The ships Ferdinand Magellan used to get to these places.

was because the lands and the seas were controlled by enemy nations. If Europeans wanted easier access to these treasures, they needed to find another way.

Explorers such as Christopher Columbus had already discovered the new world called the American continent. However, no one had yet discovered a westward passage from Europe to Asia.

Ferdinand determined that he could accomplish this amazing mission. First, he went to the rulers of his home country, Portugal. The king refused to help him.

Next, Ferdinand went to the rulers of Spain. This time he was successful. The rulers agreed to fund his trip. He was given five ships, and they set sail on September 20, 1519. They sailed south toward Africa, then they headed southwest toward the tip of South America. The journey was long. It took many months.

This ended up being a bad choice. During a fight with the native people, Ferdinand was killed in battle.

His people were left to return to Spain without him. There were now only two ships, and the journey would be dangerous. On their way back, one of the ships became ruined. It could no longer sail. Now there was only one ship left out of five to get back to Spain.

The last ship finally returned to Spain on September 8, 1522. It had been three years since it left.

Ferdinand Magellan's voyage around South America and the passage through the Strait of Magellan. His journey proved other theories wrong. It also showed that the world was not flat.
